

Heather Alberro is a PhD candidate at NTU's Department of Politics and International Relations, part of the 'Ethics, Ecology, & Identity' research group. Her PhD thesis is centred around the investigation of radical environmental groups' deep ecological worldviews, modes of relationality, and fundamental oppositions to the status quo as living manifestations of Ecotopia. However, her background and interests span a range of disciplines including environmental sociology, environmental ethics, English literature, political ecology, and environmental science. She completed her B.A in Sociology with minor concentrations in English literature and philosophy at the University of Miami, and her MSc in environmental sociology at the University of Kent. Among other things, her academic and personal interests involve critical analyses of the human-nature dialectic, specifically interactions with more-than-human species, and the ways in which we may radically reconstruct how we subsist, interact with and perceive the natural world along more harmonious trajectories. The onset of the Anthropocene and the planet's sixth mass extinction have indeed rendered these endeavours more pressing than ever before.
